General Recommendation for all Spira chairs upholstered in Leather

Spira chairs and armchairs, all upholstered versions, are equipped with a stacking protection, which is an integrated part of the seat construction.

Due to the natural characteristics of leather there is always a general risk for imprints and marks in the surface caused by pressure, sharp objects etc.

In general a leather chair is a more exclusive, but also a more easily damaged product compared to a chair upholstered in fabric.

Even if there is a possibility to stack a Spira-chair, the chosen specification still needs to be adapted to the intended use and environment at the final customer.

Leather chairs should in the first hand be used as permanent piece of furniture.

The Spira stacking protection sufficiently equalizes the pressure on a seat upholstered in fabric, but on leather versions there will still most probably be imprints in the leather caused by the weight and frame of the chair. The time the chair is kept stacked is also an important factor.

If the customer intends to use the possibility to stack a Spira chair upholstered in leather, a supplementary padding must be used between every chair.

This supplement can be offered by Lammhults on request. Always do this recommendation at an early stage when upholstery in leather is discussed in a project.

The Spira chair has been a tremendous success since the introduction in the end of 2003.

The functionality of the Spira concept has been currently developed, including possibilities to retrofit both a new kind of linking device as well as a foldable working surface. Also the basic demand for a stackable chair was developed with the plastic stacking protection mounted as standard on all upholstered chairs.

One explanation of the Spira success is the wide range of possible applications. Hundreds of basic wooden Spira chairs complemented with linking devices and transport trolleys, compared with the use of a Spira in leather as an exclusive visitor's or conference chair, is an example which demonstrates the width of the Spira concept.
